What Procurement Teams Should Ask a Security Provider Before Shortlisting

Your 5-step guide to procurement confidence

WHY NZSA MEMBERSHIP MATTERS

The NZSA represents over 85% of the NZ security industry by revenue — making membership a meaningful signal for any procurement team.

Membership is one of the clearest signals a buyer has when assessing who is fit and proper.

Verify Current NZSA Membership

Membership in the New Zealand Security Association is one of the clearest signals a buyer has when assessing whether a provider is fit and proper to operate on your site.

What this means for procurement:

NZSA members answer to a professional standard beyond the contract clause — a key gate for government and critical infrastructure buyers.

What to ask:

☐ Request evidence of current NZSA membership before shortlisting.

of the NZ security industry by revenue is represented by NZSA members

Membership is the signal — not just the contract clause.

Ask for the compliance pack before you shortlist any provider.

Documented Quality & Safety Processes

What to ask for

Ask the provider to supply documented procedures for quality control and health & safety on your site. This means written processes — not verbal assurances.

Documented systems show a provider operates to a repeatable standard and can be independently audited if required.

For government and critical infrastructure buyers, verified safety processes are often a procurement gate, not a bonus.

Red Wolf includes documented quality and safety processes in every compliance pack — provided up front.

4 Facility-Specific References

What to look for

References should match the type of facility being tendered — not just a list of past clients. Ask for experience with similar environments, access control complexity, and security scale.

Why it matters

Generic references leave procurement teams guessing. For government and critical infrastructure buyers, verified facility-specific experience is a gate — not a bonus.

Ask: request referees from facilities like yours, not just any past client.
A confident provider will have them ready.

Red Wolf matches references to your facility type — provided with every tender.

What the right provider delivers for your team:

Shorter evaluation. Fewer clarification queries.

Compliance evidence up front means less back-and-forth for procurement.

On-site personnel answering to an external standard.

NZSA membership and full licensing — not just a contract clause.

For government buyers — verification is a gate.

Critical infrastructure tenders require this. We come ready.
